Francis Wilcox came to see me this morning. He had been at his outpost in Bologna, where he said the courses were [redacted] enthusiastically attended. A new building in Washington for his school of international studies will be completed this autumn.

the British Export Council. He was pleased with the progress they are making.

The short speeches made by Home and Brandt were excellent. Brandt creates a favorable impression, and justly so, wherever he goes. I think he understood how unimportant were the recent small demonstrations against him in England. In this connection, Tufton Beamish, who was at the lunch, told me that on one occasion he had spoken as a Conservative MP at a Communist-sponsored meeting. He was physically assaulted on the platform, dragged from it, and expelled from the hall. He commented that such behavior should not be taken too seriously, and advised Brandt to make light of his experience upon his return to Berlin. The French and German Ambassadors were both there. Chauvel says he is being wined and dined to such an extent he can hardly attend to his preparations for departure on May 1st.

Alec talked to me about the meeting at Geneva, from which he has not derived much comfort, although he thinks the last word has not yet been said on whether or not the Soviets may become more reasonable regarding nuclear testing and disarmament. He asked me to come and see him later in the week.

Stefan Zamoyski came to see me this afternoon. He said General Anders was rather hurt by receiving no direct response from the President to his letter regarding recognition of the permanency of the Oder-Neisse line. Mac Bundy had responded to it on the President's behalf. He requested me to invite Col. Anders to lunch, which I shall do.

The Japanese Ambassador, Katsumi Ohno, made his return call on me this afternoon. He does not strike me as being a gay blade.

Murray Marder, of the Washington Post, told me about his conversations at Geneva with Soviet correspondents. He does not think the Soviets will change their attitude toward nuclear testing. He believes anxious to resume their own
